COPE facilitation and leadership programs are an outdoor education extension of the Boy Scouts of America that aim to break down and re-establish group dynamics by addressing common communication problems in a challenging environment. Working in the spaces between outdoor education, team building facilitation, and traditional classroom-based education, this taster session will explore how these methods can be used across different spaces, especially with an eye towards peace education and conflict resolution. This session will be led by a ten-year facilitator and will include both hands-on activities and discussion sessions to explore the ways in which outdoor education practices might be beneficial tools to facilitate more open conversation, different methods of conflict resolution, and different, dynamic learning environments within both traditional and non-traditional classrooms.
